He Tossed Them a Line.

News dispatches the other day related that some young women in a boat capsized, and that a spectator jumped into the river and was drowned with the girls he tried to save. His wife looked on from the river bank.

Dispatches from New York Tuesday told of a young woman who plunged into the East River, and how two young men jumped in to save her.
This story, however, was different from the first. The young woman fought her rescuers and might have drowned both, but—"The captain of a tugboat tossed the rescuers a line and drew the trio aboard."

That is all there is to it. That is the only difference between drowning and not drowning in most river accidents, just the difference between a few feet of rope, and no rope.

Generally, however, there never is a rope around when somebody is drowning, never a rope when it is most needed.

The answer is: Put some life lines at the few places where drownings are likely to happen.—Wichita Eagle.
